She jumped, letting out a small squeal as there was a knock on her car window.

“God, you scared the crap out of me,” Amanda growled, unbuckling her seat and jerking the car door open, stepping out of the vehicle with a small frown marring her features.

“Sorry, I was just wondering if the two of y'all were planning on staying in there to chit-chat 'til the cows come home or if you were going to come in and say howdy to me and my pack.”

“Howdy?” Amanda said, squinting up in the sunlight in an attempt to get a good look at the person in front of her.

The man before her was tall, about six-foot three inches.

He had sandy-blond hair and scruff decorating his chin that looked two days old.

He wore a blue flannel shirt with the top few buttons undone and a pair of light blue jeans with brown cowboy boots.

He wore a simple white baseball cap with some obscure logo on it.

If she were honest with herself, she was almost disappointed that he wasn't wearing a cowboy hat; it would have completed the rugged, western ranch-hand look that he otherwise had going for him.
