A very famous Doctor who is in the habit of experimenting new research which no other medical personality has ever ventured. Most of his research is involved with humans and their ability to withstand extreme pressure and torture to the human body and soul. In one such experiment the Doctor himself becomes the Guinea -pig. As his experiment happened to be something related to the human brain where he demonstrates that if a human could put 'mind over matter' humans could overcome any kind of stress. In doing so the Doctor has a set back and loses his mind. The medical association debar the Doctor and strikes him off their medical association and cancels his license. The Doctor is branded as a crazy nut.

In spite of this set back the Doctor still continues with his experiments, which the Medical association declares a illegal. To be away from the association and the general public the Doctor moves to a remote location where very few people frequent and start his experiments once again. This time he finds a willing subject for his experiment. The Doctor's experiment involves in how to control the mind to overcome sleep, how far a human can be without sleep, he succeeds by getting his subject to go without sleep for 15 days though successful he finds his subject losing consciousness and almost going into a coma but the doctor is prepared for such reactions as such he uses a kind of serum injection to bring his subject back to normal conditions. Though the medical association does not recognize his illegal research success, but off the record, the doctor becomes the first man in history to help put a human being through for fifteen days
