Never Out of Love: A General Theory of Attraction Michael Gauvin

We hate being alone, so we try hooking up with people we like and who like us back. Relationships grow and bloom. Then they wither and die. Sorry for being so dramatic, but you know how it is. At any rate, happy couples are not about to read this book. My research deals with relationship dysfunction and aims at readers experiencing troubles in the love department. Some of these people can't find a suitable partner and suffer from years of involuntary celibacy or dreadful dating. Others manage to find a partner, build something strong enough to stand for a season or two, struggle for a few more years trying to keep it together, then watch powerlessly as everything finally comes crashing down. Most people alternate between looking for love, finding it, losing it and starting all over again from scratch. Among those who choose to remain partners in a dysfunctional relationship, most are either miserable, in denial or cheating. That's how things have been and we're sick with it, aren't we? We want a relationship that works and lasts. Therefore, I will be asking the following two questions throughout this book: why don't people stick together and what can we do about it?
