Sonya Elliott was a twenty-eight-year-old outspoken college dropout who loved living life to the fullest. She enjoyed partying, drinking, and her men for one purpose only. Recreational sex. Love and marriage had no place in her life. There certainly was no room for quiet and reserved next door neighbor, Daniel Keller. Considered a genius amongst his peers, Sonya, however, found him to be a complete bore. Far too shy and reserved, he adhered to high morals and spent far too much time with his head inside a computer. And though she found him to be a real nice guy, a great neighbor at best, he hardly fit into her world.

Nevertheless, this does not stop Sonya's interest being piqued when she spies Daniel through her peephole with an unknown redhead engaged in a little soap opera scene outside his apartment. Nor when he entertains his new intern by the name of Jamie in his apartment several late nights in a row. Her interest is suddenly aroused and she takes it upon herself to filter the woman coming and going in Daniel's life. She concedes he is a rare commodity and deserves an equally unique woman. He was too decent to allow some little tramp to use him for a one-night stand. Daniel Keller was marriage material. It was up to her that he remained that way.
